

The Sundering Spring, 10

Longwalker,

The urgency of your warnings, delivered by Jekk and your noble servant Galan at the head of a column of Jolkounites freed from the chains of the Gray Dwarves, are not lost upon me.

Our family's estate overrun by the Undead, Elemental, and Gnoll servants of the Red Wizard's wounds my very spirit. To learn that the wards meant to keep away those who mean us harm have been corrupted to instead cause those of Floslin blood pain, to repel us from our ancestral home, is almost too much to bare.

I believe the attack on our family's lands is but the latest provocation from an enemy that has been gathering strength. However, thanks to Isteval's Company, we only have the Thayan Gnolls and the Red Wizard's accursed minions to contend with instead of a combined force of Goblins, Ores, and Gray Dwarves.

Still, I believe the Thayan march towards Daggerford has only truly begun in earnest and I do not plan to simply await their arrival outside our walls.

Duke Maldwyn has given me leave to keep a small force of scouts in the field so we might remain informed on enemy troop movements and so be best warned of impending attacks.

It is good that the Company of Isteral happened upon your beleaguered servant Galan while on the road back to Daggerford. I am heartened that those stout heroes have gone to take back our family's estate and I trust that what you do now will only aid their efforts.

I pray this missive finds you successful, Uncle, and that we will have the strength.

-Kelson

D&D Encounters : Scourge of the Sword Coast
Twenty Sided Store 2014

